In 1985 the Northern Alberta Development Council (NADC) published the third edition of Inventory of Infrastructure for Northern Alberta Communities. The inventory has been one of the most sought after NADC publications. It is a useful source of basic information on services available in northern communities.

The NADC is pleased to present the fourth edition of Inventory of Infrastructure. New infrastructure projects have greatly improved the level of service in many northern communities. At the same time, large-scale resource developments have intensified the need for up-to-date information on available services.

The 1990 inventory relies on data submitted by all levels of government. The NADC wishes to thank all those who took the time to answer questionnaires or assist in the study in any way.

We welcome comments and suggestions regarding the 1990 edition. We hope Inventory of Infrastructure will contribute to the continued improvement of essential services in the north.

What is the inventory?

Inventory of Infrastructure for Northern Alberta Communities, 1990 is an up-dated edition of documents produced by the Northern Alberta Development Council (NADC) in 1977, 1980 and 1985. Only communities located north of the NADC administrative boundary are included in the inventory (see Map).

A total of 152 communities are represented in the inventory. These include:

- 2 cities
- 26 towns
- 14 villages
- 82 hamlets
- 20 Indian bands
- 8 Metis settlements

The Chipewyan, Cold Lake First Nations, Cree, Lubicon Lake, Sawridge and Sucker Creek Indian bands are not included in the inventory. Information on these bands could not be collected.

In keeping with past inventories, the term "infrastructure" is broadly defined to include both physical structures, such as roads and airstrips, and essential services such as health care, education and fire protection. Information contained in the inventory is organized into 16 different categories:

- Water
- Sewer
- Waste
- Electricity
- Transportation
- Health Services
- Education
- Public Housing
- Police Protection
- Fire Protection
- Recreation
- Tourism
- Financial
- Communication
- Local Government
- Government Offices

How was the inventory prepared?

Inventory information was collected in three stages. First, a questionnaire designed to collect up-to-date information on services in each community was sent out to administrators of municipalities, counties, municipal districts, improvement districts, metis settlements and Indian bands. Survey data were then compared with information available from federal and provincial government departments. Any deficiencies or inconsistencies were then checked by follow-up telephone conversations with agencies or organizations with local knowledge. Data contained in the inventory are believed to be the most current available at the time of verification.

Because of the rapid change that characterizes the north, users are advised to augment information in the inventory with information from other sources. The NADC and other government departments have current documents which describe the availability of services in northern communities. There are also knowledgeable community members, private businessmen and local officials capable of providing up-to-date information on specific communities. The footnotes contained in the Summary Tables on Services section (p. 317) show the data sources used to prepare this document.

What changes have been made to the inventory?

Every effort has been made to maintain consistency with past inventories. Users of the 1985 document will note that many categories have been expanded to include additional information on services or facilities. Seven changes are particularly noteworthy:

1. The list of inventoried communities has been expanded to include hamlets with populations under 75.

2. Television service has been changed to reflect the type of service available rather than the off-air stations received. The growth of cable, microwave and satellite services has significantly reduced the importance of off-air reception.

3. Information on telephone service has been dropped from the inventory. All of northern Alberta will have private line service by June of 1991.

4. A list of local organizations has been deleted since they are not considered essential services.

5. Information on Indian bands is now included in the same alphabetical listing as other communities. Readers should note that many bands have more than one reserve. A "by reserve" breakdown of inventory data is provided only for the Saddle Lake Band. This band has two widely separate reserves (Saddle Lake and Whitefish Lake) each having its own band council. Inventory information on the remaining bands is for total on-reserve services.

6. The category describing air ambulance service in the north has been deleted from the inventory. Air ambulance service is available throughout the north.

7. The list of recreation facilities covered by the inventory has been expanded from seven to 13. New listings include: ball diamonds, sports fields, tennis courts, ski hills, bowling lanes, auditoriums and golf courses.

How is the inventory organized?

The inventory is organized into four sections. This section contains background information on the inventory. The next section (Community Inventories) provides a breakdown of services available in each community. This is followed by a series of summary tables on services. These tables are organized by type of service (e.g., Education, Fire Protection etc.). The final section provides a tabular summary of population information derived from the 1976, 1981 and 1986 Canada Census. It also lists the geographic size of municipalities, metis settlements and Indian reserves.

How to read the inventory

Inventory data for each community are presented in the "Community Inventories" section. Each inventory begins with the community name, municipal status, 1990 official population and a brief historical and/or locational description of the community. Other NADC publications

Readers are advised of three other recent NADC publications that may assist them in conducting research on northern Alberta and its communities. These can be obtained, along with a current publications list, from the Northern Development Branch in Peace River.

- Northern Alberta Today. Published in 1985, this document provides one of the most comprehensive regional overviews on northern Alberta currently available. It serves as an excellent introduction to the region and its people.
- Trends in Northern Alberta: A Statistical Overview (1970 - 1990). This document consolidates a wide range of statistical data on the north. Information contained in the report can assist researchers in gauging regional trends in such areas as population and demographics, socio-economic conditions, infrastructure and services and economic development.

- Profiles of Regions and Communities in Northern Alberta. This two volume set, published in May of 1991, is a companion document to the Inventory of Infrastructure. It provides additional information on community infrastructure, economic activity, population trends and local history. Its approach is both narrative and graphic.
